These Days hopes that the simplicity of chill-and-serve will drive demand on this modern spin on a nostalgic serve. It is selling its lines at TheseDaysDrinks.com.

Lotte offers 15% discount on alcohol to mark official opening at Jeju Airport

South Korean tourist hotspot Jeju Island saw the official opening of a 545sqm Lotte Duty Free airport store at the end of October, marked by the attendance of high-level VIPs and dignitaries, including Lotte Duty Free's CEO Jooom Kim.

Jeju, a self-governing province with some similarities to Hainan in China, is expected to see a strong pick-up in travel in the coming years, making this latent store from Lotte strategically important.

"The grand opening of this Jeju Airport branch symbolizes the restart of free overseas travel," said Kim. "We will strive to provide a world-class shopping environment to foreign customers visiting Jeju."

The entire drinks offer, which includes high-end Cognac and wine, will be up to 15% discounted for a limited time to celebrate the launch, while selected beauty brands will be reduced by up to 20%. Lotte is also upgrading membership levels of its loyalty scheme for certain customers.

Liquor and beauty are the core categories at the store, and September sales increased by about 385% compared with March, when Lotte took over. But there is still a hill to climb — while major air routes to China and Taiwan have increased, and the number of international passengers is also rising, international outbound passengers at Jeju Airport in August hit about 77,000, still only at 60% of the number for the same period in pre-pandemic 2019.

Lotte Duty Free, which was selected as the new departures duty-free store operator at Jeju International Airport in January, said that in the future it plans to draw up more stores by creating synergies between its Jeju downtown and airport branches. This will be mainly by holding discount events to attract more foreign customers.

UK airport staff vetting service will boost airside retail and hospitality recruitment

Aviation Recruitment Network (ARN) has launched a nationwide vetting service to help reduce the amount of time it takes to recruit airport staff in the UK.

Staff shortages that led to huge delays at airports last year were partly due to the lengthy security vetting needed for anyone working airside. This process also causes hold-ups for airport travel retail and food and beverage operators recruiting retail assistants and hospitality staff.

ARN's service is available to airport-based businesses that don't have recruitment partners, but want to get new workers cleared to fill vacancies faster, heading off staff shortages and reducing hiring times.

ARN managing director Kelly Sandhu said: "Our research shows that it can often take months for security checks to be completed before staff can start work. If they are offered a role elsewhere in the meantime, they may be enticed to take it. This results in a costly recruitment process and frustration between the candidate and the hire."

He said that the industry average security clearance time is between 30 and 60 days, but that ARN has brought this down to 25 days due to a combination of 25 years' industry experience, bespoke systems and streamlined vetting processes.
